What's New In Adobe Photoshop CC 2019 Version 20?

Significance of surrogate biomarkers in prognosticating the efficacy of therapy in acute myeloid leukemia. The prognostic significance of surrogate biomarkers in myeloid leukemia remains uncertain. We studied the prognostic significance of the surrogate biomarkers, myeloperoxidase (MPO), alkaline phosphatase (ALP), lactate dehydrogenase (LDH), and the acute leukemia inhibitory factor receptor (ALIAR) in patients with acute myeloid leukemia (AML) treated on three consecutive prospective Phase II trials. In all, 232 patients with AML were enrolled. The median age at trial entry was 49 years, and the median number of previous chemotherapies was 3. The median WBC count was $13.8 \times 10^9/L$, with 56% of patients exhibiting leukocytosis. The median platelet count was $110 \times 10^9/L$, and only 9% had thrombocytopenia. The median LDH was 596 U/L, the median ALP was 2,400 U/L, and the median MPO was 57 U/L. The median ALIAR was 2.66×10^6 L/microg of DNA. With a median follow-up of 14 months, estimated 6-month overall survival (OS) was 22%, whereas median OS was 6.1 months. Each biomarker showed a progressive decline in median OS from the highest to the lowest quartile of values. MPO and ALP had the strongest association with decreased median OS. In a multivariable analysis, MPO and LDH remained significant predictors of unfavorable OS. MPO and LDH were also significant predictors of relapse free survival. Elevation of surrogate biomarkers at trial entry is an independent and powerful prognostic factor in AML and is correlated with MPO and LDH mRNA expression. The development of these biomarkers may help identify patients at risk of early death, in an effort to design less toxic therapy.
